As it is looks just about ok, and we can't find a shop to fix the problem we will live with it! If this is you then here is a quick guide, we used to carry a spare tyre. If you get a puncture you need to change the wheel, push the car forward and remove the tyre, fill it and pull off the wheel, rinse the wheel with water and put it back on. Towards better understanding of executive functions in people with autism spectrum disorder. The deficit hypothesis suggests that autism spectrum disorder (ASD) is characterized by impaired executive functions (EFs). Findings relating to three of the EF domains that comprise EFs (set-shifting, inhibition, and working memory) are reviewed. Research on set-shifting and inhibition is reviewed in the context of the two leading hypotheses concerning EFs in ASD: the inefficiency hypothesis (insufficient EF resources) and the cascade hypothesis (EF deficits lead to impairments in more complex cognitive processes). Research on working memory is reviewed in the context of individual differences in the executive component of working memory (i.e. updating) and interindividual differences in executive WM (i.e. updating/shifting). The review concludes with a discussion of the limitations and future directions for research on EFs in ASD. Detection of manganese superoxide dismutase by fluorescence microscopy of tissue sections.
